If you own stock, your voice is being silenced — even if most people don’t realize it yet.

Over 100 million Americans are shareholders through retirement, 401(k), and pension plans.

For decades, shareholders have had the right to speak up when companies take risks that threaten long-term value — from weak oversight to safety failures to financial exposure from natural disasters.

This right helps protect your retirement savings, and it helps companies make better decisions.

Now, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and some states are considering drastic changes that would make it harder for shareholders to raise concerns with the companies they own.

Less accountability.

Less transparency.

More risk for investors.

We must protect shareholder rights and the integrity of the free market.

Learn what’s at stake — and how you can help:

freedomtoinvest.org/shareholder-rights

Freedom to Invest